

CHAPTER V

CONCLUSION AND SUGGESTION

In this chapter, the researcher presents an overview of the findings of the study. Meanwhile, the chapter provides some recommendations for future studies dealing with similar topics, theories, or methodological approaches. The chapter provides insights into the practical applications of the findings and suggests further research to gain a deeper understanding of the topic being discussed.

5.1 Conclusion

Language is a system of communication who used by people to talk with each other. In language, words that are used in a structured and conventional manner and are conveyed through speech, writing, or gestures. Language as a communication tool acquired by man as human equipped with Language Acquisition Devices (LAD) from birth to at different ages depending on the views to experts. Adults have a very important influence in language development in children. Children at 3 or 4 years old have thousands of vocabulary, grammar complex and phonological system and some for how to use their language in many social background.

According to the data, there are a few factors are considered to play a role in development language, but in this book only two are particularly including : age and environment.

5.2 Suggestion

Here are a few recommendations for future researchers interested in exploring related studies:

1. Encourage your child to talk regularly to you and other people around him. Active communication helps them understand how to use words and sentences correctly.
2. Bringing children to interact with peers and other adults helps them understand the different ways people communicate and expands their vocabulary.
